"Each day is a new blessing from God, a proof of his love to you."

- Happy Life by Joanna de Angelis / Divaldo Franco

- Does the principle according to which humans are only trustees of the wealth that God has allowed them to enjoy during their lives take away their right to transfer it to their descendants?

After their death, people can rightly transfer what they have enjoyed during their lives, because the effect of such right is always dependent on the will of God, who can prevent their descendants from enjoying it whenever he wants. That is why we see apparently solidly established fortunes crumble. The will of persons to keep their wealth in the hands of their descendants is therefore powerless, although this fact does not take away their right to transfer the loan they have received, since God will take it from their descendants if he deems it appropriate.

- St. Louis (Paris, 1860) at The Gospel According to Spiritism, Ch 16, item 15.
